

Exercise 1: Background and Commentary Sources
(due March 1, 2010)

Your client owns a small business in Chicago with several full- and part-time employees. She wants to put together an employee handbook containing company policies and rules, a description of the health insurance and other benefits available to employees, and other information about the company. But first, she wants to know whether distributing such a handbook will make it more difficult for her to fire employees. For this exercise, you are to use only print materials, not online services (although you may want to explore online counterparts of the materials after completing the exercise).

1. List some factual and legal concepts (including synonyms, antonyms, and broader and narrower terms) that might help you research the above scenario.

| | |
|-------|-------|
| _____ | _____ |
| _____ | _____ |
| _____ | _____ |

2. Consult a law dictionary to look up one of the legal concepts that you listed above. Write out (or briefly summarize) the definition that you found.

3. Formulate a statement of the main issue raised by this scenario. (Include both the relevant legal and factual concepts; try to write it in the same style that you would use for a “question presented” in an objective memorandum.)

- Using the print edition of one of the major national legal encyclopedias (American Jurisprudence 2d or Corpus Juris Secundum), locate information relevant to the scenario. Briefly describe below the process you used and what kind of information you found. (For example, indicate the concepts that you looked up, whether you used the index or started with the main part of the encyclopedia, the title of the article/topic that you found most useful, whether there was relevant information in the pocket part, what kind of law appears to govern—e.g., state vs. federal, statutory vs. common law, etc.)

- Using one of the major legal periodicals indices (Index to Legal Periodicals or Current Law Index/Legal Resource Index), find an article published in an academic law review that appears to be relevant to the scenario, or at least peripherally related to it. (Make sure that the article appears in an academic law review or journal that is published by a law school, such as The John Marshall Law Review or The John Marshall Journal of Computer & Information Law, rather than a practitioner-oriented periodical like the CBA Record or the Illinois Bar Journal. Look at a volume of the publication itself if you are not sure about this—most academic law reviews share a similar format.) Write the citation to the article below; include the citation information that appears in the index, and don't worry about citation format.
